The care and feeding of corporate jets: big business

by Liz Gautier

From Natchez to Mobile...from Teterboro to St. Joe...wherever the four winds blow, you can travel, wrapped in cocoon-like comfort, sheltered like a shah and protected with all the privacy of a potentate.

But you don't travel by ordinary conveyances. You don't fight the madding crowds at commercial airports, nor do you sit, chauffer-driven, inching along heavily trafficked archaic, potholed streets. You go first class, but with a difference.

Perhaps you are fortunate enough to belong to an evergrowing crowd of corporate executives who travel their business routes in the fastest growing industry in the corporate world today - the luxury and security of the corporate jet. And travel by company plane isn't luxury anymore, it's a necessity for the chief executive officer and corporate executives whose time is truly money.

Owning a corporate jet does create other problems however. You just don't park a jet in your company parking lot, hoping it will be ready and able to get you to your next board meeting. You need help, and you need help from people who are organized and experienced in the care and feeding of the business status symbol - the company plane.

One of the top and largest air fleet management firms in the world today is Executive Air Fleet Corporation, based at Teterboro Airport in Teterboro, New Jersey.

At any time you can gaze over the vast expanse of EAF's tarmac and see planes from Germany, Japan, Saudi Arabia, England and Venezuela. You can see anything from a helicopter to a 727, all a part of the fleet of corporate air transportation managed by EAF.

EAF, the largest corporate aircraft charter service in the United States, charts 2,000 trips per year out of their offices. The charter service is worldwide and also serves as a clearing house for international charters, having their own customs clearing house for foreign visitors.
